

Albert Einstein and Sherlock Holmes met while being on vacation in Toronto (Canada). As they recognized each other, they went together to Greenland to investigate the disappearance of icebergs, at the request of Adobe.

They arrived to Kangerlussuaq Airport, after flying around hurricane Ophelia. The largest and busiest airport in Greenland is Kangerlussuaq Airport just north of the polar circle. This is the main traffic connection to Greenland. There, a Google LLC bus picked them up to bring them to the capital of Greenland, Nuuk.

It was complicated to get there, although. Imagine two people, speaking only English and German, trying to talk with a bus driver knowing only Finnish and Norwegian? They ended nearly going towards the North Pole, visiting Santa Claus way ahead of Christmas. Eventually, sign languages saved the day and they came to an agreement.

At Nuuk, a statue of Erik the Red, who discovered Greenland in 982, pointed them to the mountains where icebergs can be found. So, they went there and found the iceberg! It wasn't missing, it didn't disappear! It just was hiding as a joke.
